Knowledgeable chronic diseases: stage b, stage c, stage d, stage e, stage f Chronic Rheumatic Diseases Rheumatoid Arthritis (RA) is an autoimmune disease in which a person's immune system attacks their body's own tissues. It can cause many different symptoms including joint swelling (swollen joints), pain, tenderness, stiffness, fatigue, and decreased function. If the immune system causes inflammation in other parts of the body it is called arthritis (joint inflammation). There are two types of RA: - Primary (unknown cause) - Secondary (cause known - will be discussed) Treatment for RA: In this case the patient is just managed with painkillers and a variety of anti-inflammatory medications. Most of them will also treat other chronic inflammatory conditions such as asthma and allergies. According to the American College of Rheumatology, to be diagnosed with RA, a person must meet three of the following four criteria: - Joint pain - Swelling of the joint - Morning stiffness - Rheumatoid Factor If a person has two or more of these four factors, it may be RA. However, a person can still have RA even if they do not have all four of these symptoms. It has been calculated that about 1 out of 500,000 people has RA. Rheumatoid arthritis and psoriatic arthritis There are several subtypes of RA. Each one of them responds differently to treatments and treatments for one may not be effective for a different. Primary Rheumatoid Arthritis The most common form of RA is known as primary (or idiopathic) rheumatoid arthritis (RA). It can occur at any age. One of the most common symptoms of this type of arthritis is difficulty making out sounds like noises due to different joints starting to lock up. This is called stiffness. The person may also have an increase in pain and tenderness in the joints. Secondary Rheumatoid Arthritis Secondary RA is also called reactive RA. This occurs when someone has a known cause of RA that their body reacts to. A persons with secondary RA may still have symptoms but they are less severe than if they had primary RA. For example, if someone had been bitten by a tick and this leads to a lot of inflammation in the joint, this can cause symptoms of RA. The most common known cause of secondary RA is a f678ea9f9e
